It does not compare itself to real-world, commercially available games, nor does it attempt to measure whether an image is above average or below. The purpose of EZBB is to test whether a given renderer is able to produce realistic images for the game's intended uses. In other words, the test is conducted by rendering a wide range of images with a given renderer on several graphics card and comparing the results to that of reference images displayed on a monitor. As of right now, EZBB is the most efficient benchmark available for all tested renderers. It produces images without any artifacts, as well as delivers fast performance. Besides, EZBB is fairly reliable, as its only weakness lies in it being unable to take into account the video cards' individual characteristics and capabilities. What you can expect from EZBB: All the problems that may arise during the creation of a benchmark can be found in EZBB. The EZBB features a wide range of difficult material, including realistic textures, cityscapes, backgrounds, grass and grassy plains, water, forests, mountains, skies, skies with clouds and skies with cumulus clouds, airplanes, and numerous other images. Most of the time, EZBB does not produce satisfactory results because of the sub-optimal performance of the tested renderers. Nevertheless, EZBB is a relatively pure tool that does not necessarily get the best results out of all the tested renderers. Therefore, it can be considered a reliable testing tool.
