Q: How to use a converter in nested custom controls I have a custom control called AddressListBox that behaves like a combobox. I also have two classes (Address and City) that implement a read only property called AddressAddress. So my question is how can I use a converter in the custom control AddressListBox to display city names from the two classes? To add more context: The custom control is used inside a data templates for displaying an address in a listbox. Here is an image of the layout of the listbox in visual studio A: You might be looking for the datacontext property of the binding (sorting on it should do the trick). The other option would be to just use a converter: Here you have several options: string: convert to string and display object: convert to object and display different property from city for example enum: convert to enum and display appropriate enum property. On client side you just bind to the property in a listbox and let the converter figure out the behavior. Q: In JavaScript, is an array an object? I would assume that an array is a container of data. Does it inherit properties and methods from its components? Are they really just like a linked list? A: Nope, not generally. Arrays in JavaScript are just objects. Arrays, due to their inherent key-value nature, inherit properties, methods, etc. from their contents. There are ways to "map" one array to another, and with the available Array.map methods you can perform "objectification" as well, but they're not the same concept in JavaScript. Lists are just a type of array. A: No. Array objects are first-class objects in JavaScript. They have all the properties and methods of all other objects, and they have an index. As of ECMAScript 5, they inherit all the properties and methods from their elements, including their length property and length in JavaScript.
